In autumn, the leaves of many trees turn from green to shades of scarlet, gold, orange, and purple.

Jack Frost is usually given credit for autumn colors, but frost has very little to do with it. The green we see in leaves all summer is due to chlorophyll. This green coloring matter acts like a little food factory, manufacturing food for the tree. Other colors — yellow, orange, red, and purple — are present in the leaf, too, but there is so much chlorophyll that we usually can't see them. In the autumn the leaves stop making chlorophyll, and then we can see the other colors.
